Title from disc label

A longitudinal study of four communities over two decades. University researchers returned to four communities first profiled in 1991 to learn how these communities have fared with tourism. In their own words, community leaders describe the changes, benefits and challenges their community has experienced from tourism development over nearly two decades. The case studies of these four communities - Dahlonega, Georgia; Sandpoint, Idaho; San Luis, Colorado and the Villages of Van Buren, Iowa - stress five core values for tourism development: maintaining authenticity and sense of place; delivering quality service and products; using tourism as a diversification strategy; encouraging local control; and assessing the true benefits and costs of tourism.
